THE GREATEST OF CLOWNS

Interesting Reminiscences of Dan Rice, Who Amused Millions of People.

What One Old Circus Man Remembers of Another-Showman, Politician, Rounder, Temperance Lecturer, General Pavorite.

Lansing (Mich.) Letter in Detroit Free Press. "I was agreeably surprised," said Joseph E. Warner, widely known throughout the United States as the veteran showman and circus manager, "when I called for my mail this morning to receive a letter from my old friend Dan Rice, famous in the forties as the world's greatest clown, and now celebrated as the only living representative of the old-time circus."

Mr. Warner is himself a gentleman of no little celebrity. Thirty years ago his name was associated with the management of a large circus, which traveled as all circuses then did, by wagon and rough roads, tumble-down bridges, and subject to all manner of inconvenience. In those days the circus was a wonderful institution. Its coming was the signal for a general holiday, and after it had gone furnished a topic for almost endless discussion. The proprietor of Warner's circus and menagerie, once so widely known, was Joseph E. Warner, who now resides in this city, and who, still having a weakness for amusement, is a member of the Common Council. He has held the office of Mayor of Lansing and was once a resident of Detroit.

"Few men now living," he said this morning, "will remember Dan Rice, when as a clown, back in the forties, he donned the motley garb, come rolling into the sawdust ring like a hoop in a continuous round of somersaults, upsetting the ringmaster, and by his peculiar autics setting his audience in an uncontrollable fit of laughter and applause, before he had opened his mouth or uttered a syllable. Rice had the happy faculty of making action speak louder than words, and this was especially noticeable in his personation of different characters. He always made it a point in every town he visited to select a dozen or more prominent persons, study their actions and eccentricities, and then after the principal equestrian had finished his act the clown would mount the borse and impersonate the different individuals with such perfect accuracy that the audience would go nearly wild with merriment Of course it was not unfrequently the case | the finest exhibition of the age, continued that some sensitive individual would take | its perambulating over the country. ulous burlesque, but Rice was glib and oily of tongue and could usually appease the wrath of the offended person. HIS VENTURES IN THE SOUTH. "The first time I ever saw Dan Rice was at Rochester, N. Y. I was a mere lad at the time, and not overburdened with the wherewith to buy a ticket to his show. It was a warm summer evening, and the side gurtains of the tent had been lowered to give circulation to the air inside. I crawled upon the roof of a building which stood close by the tent and lay there for two hours, peeping over the side walls of the tent. I could see every act and hear distinetly the songs and jokes of the clown. Two years later I had drifted to New Orleans. Here I met Dan Rice in person for the first time. I related the Rochester incident to him, and a friendship sprang up between us which has lasted to this day. "Rice at that time, 1852, was the proprietor of a grand amphitheater on St. Charles street in New Orleanes. The building was constructed after his own plans and with his own money, at a cost of $110,000. Directly opposite on the same street was a large museum, owned and managed by himself. These two temples of amusement were known respectively as "Dan Rice's Amphitheater" and "Dan Rice's Museum." The museum was in those days what Barnum's Zoological Exhibition was to New York. It is an epoch in the history of my own life, known to but few persons of the present day, but at that time, at the age o twenty, I was a full-fledged magician. soon found myself installed in the museum. where, with a lucrative salary, I continued to deal out devilment in a mystifying manner to the bewildered and bewitched masses, for one hundred consecutive days. From that time on I seldom lost sight of Dan Rice, though it was ten years later before we again became associated together in a business way. "In the first years of his circus life his mode of transportation was principally by canal, and there was scarcely a town along the old Erie, the Wabash, the Lehigh and the Whitehall, that did not welcome Dan Rice once or twice during the season. His name was a household word along the meanderings of these various waterways, and his coming always the occasion for a general holiday. In his natural desire for more worlds to conquor, he transferred his show from the scenes of his early triumphs to the Ohio river, stepping from the deck of a canal boat to the deck of a large steamer named Dan Rice and, with his show on board, he penetrated to the head waters of the navigable streams tributary to the Ohio and Mississippi, and to the denizens of the valleys of these mighty streams his name soon became the synonym of good cheer and happiness.

Rice was a Northerner, and a true-blue Unionist, notwithstanding his large property interests in the South. When signs of the war of the rebellion began to appear, he strove to tortify himself against it by preparing for himself an elegant home in Girard, Pa., whither, by degrees, he transferred much of his valuable property from New Orleans, although when the final crash came, and the war was precipitated, a large amount eral years delivered speeches upon the evils of his belongings at the South was config- of intemperance. His manhood again as-

"Up to this time the life of Dan Rice had been one continual round of success, and his accumulations were valued at millions of dollars. Soon, however, his fortunes began to wane. Abandoning his Southern enterprises and river shows. he organized an immense aggregation on wheels. At the same time he became fascinated with the charms of politics. His ambition seemed to be leading him into new and less profitable channels, but his great show, which was beyond question the finest exhibition of the age, continued exceptions to being made the butt of ridic- discarded the cap and bells, laid aside the I remarkable man."

motley garb of the clown, and made a vain and heroic effort to entertain the people by appearing in the ring in full evening dress. Playing clown in a swallow-tailed coat could not be popularized at that time, even by Dan Rice. Patriotic appeals and political harangues failed to please, and the oldtime demonstrations of joy that had often made the people forget their sorrows and revel in the sunshine of the old clown's pleasantries, were not aroused. But Rice was a stern, inflexible man. Nothing that friend or foe could say would change his

BAD LUCK IN POLITICS. "At the close of the war he erected a monument at Girard to the memory of the soldiers of Erie county, at an expense of $10,000. I was agent for his show at that time, and was instructed to arrange my route so as to close the season at Girard on a certain day in October, when the monument was to be dedicated. Rice had looked forward to this day as one to be especially noted in his eventful and erratic life. He had erected a mammoth tableaux car which led the retinue of his entire traveling exhibition, and hundreds of country wagons through the street in grand procession. The car was drawn by a herd of elephants. with the famous old pachyderm "Romeo' at the wheel. Thirty-two young ladies robed in white reclining among the folds of the American flag, graced the deck of the car. It was estimated that twenty thousand persons were present. Among the number were many noted men of the time, including Governor Todd, of Ohio, Gov. Andrew Curtin, of Pennsylvania, Gov. Beriah McGoffin, of Kentucky, Senator Ben Wade, of Obio, and a dozen others of equal celebrity, who were guests at the Rice mansion. Inspired by the acclamations of the people Rice per-mitted his name to be hoisted at the head of several local papers as the people's candidate for Congress. Failing to capture this position the following presidential election found many faithful followers pushing him to the front as the people's candidate for President. In many leading cities large banners were swung across the streets, and on Broadway, New York, a monster banner spanned the street, which read: 'Dan Rice, the people's choice for President.

"These campaigns drew heavily on his bank account. The great show continued to tramp over the country, but it soon became known that the old clown was not with it. The patronage dwindled until the expenses soon began to exceed the receipts. About this time Rice was seized with the mining craze, and much of his wealth went up the spout in speculation. He bought a newspaper in Girard, and was ostensibly its editor. He became interested in manufacturing, out he seemed to lose on everything he touched. Fickle Fortune. which smiled upon him so graciously in early years, seemed to forsake him, and every effort that he made to regain his former prestige tailed him atterly. Dan Rice. the once millionaire, became a pauper. Without a dollar, driven to desperation, he took to drink. By his own manliness, however, he was reclaimed. He laid aside the glass, mounted the lecture platform, and for sevserted itself. Wealth again began to pour into his coffers, and to-day the possessions of Dan Rice are rated up in the hundreds of thousands of dollars.

"He has just now passed his seventieth birthday. He has a comfortable home on Twenty-first street in New York, where he resides in winter, and a modern cottage at Long Branch, where he passes the summer months. He is the owner of a large plantation in Texas, and deals extensively in Southern and Western lands. Dan Rice was the greatest and most original clown that this or any other country ever produced, and in many respects was a most
